New York's Meat Fad. Porterhouse steaks have gone out of fashion, according to one of the up town butchers who supply meat to lot of the families in the fashionable districts on Riverside drive and Wes End avenue. For years and years the porterhouse steak has been considere the best cut of beef and has fetched the highest price. Now the deman is for the Delmonico steak, which is the porterhouse with the bit of the ten derloin cut out of it.

A dislike for the tasteless bit of ten derloin seems to have developed unless chef knows how to prepare. There is more flavor to the sirloin, and so th demand is for either the bone sirloin as it is called, or the Delmonico steal which follows it in the carving of "critter." This fancy has generally put out the butchers, who have now to find a new way to carve their meats to an advantage. Even when the tenderloin is cut away from the bone it is said by the dealers to be the hardest piece of the beef now to dispose of to advantage.-New York Times
